Excerpt: . . . unexpectedly, with a friend, but is to be back again in a week. Then she is going for good, did you know it I really dont know what to think about Milly; I have had such hopes of her; she seems determined not to think of anything beyond the present. And yet she might be such a happy, useful Christian! It seems her uncle wants to adopt her, and Doctor says he is a mere worldling, --a man whose sole happiness is placed in riches, and that he is quite unscrupulous as to the manner of acquiring them. I dont want poor, vain, little Milly to go there. She has talked with me about it, Martha said, and once seemed very undecided; but the last time she spoke of it she had fully made up her mind to go. Well, we must hope for the best. You heard, I suppose, that Blanchard has decided to go into the ministry. Everybody approves of it but Mary; she seems very unhappy about it. More shame for her, said mother Bright, coming into the room and overhearing the last remark of the doctors wife. A proud and happy woman would I have been, if my boy, instead of going into mercantile life, had chosen the ministry; yes, even in his far-off home. But we cant help these things, can we, if we try ever so hard I dont see that we can, said the doctors wife, smiling....
